Patient Patrons

If you ask the team at Hall & Wrye Plastic Surgeons and Aesthetic Treatment Centers, top-of-the-line training and personalized patient care are paramount to successful reconstruction or cosmetic procedures.

Tracy Dufur, CEO

According to a 2023 RealSelf culture report, nearly 1 out of 4 adults in the United States has had at least one cosmetic procedure. However, that doesn't mean people don't have any concerns about the process, such as safety during the procedure or the ensuing healing downtime. Tracy Dufur, CEO of Nevada-based Hall & Wrye Plastic Surgeons and Aesthetic Treatment Centers, says the doctors, nurses, or technicians whom patients choose to do their treatments matters above all else.

"As the aesthetic industry continues to grow, I hope that patients do their research so they can find reputable certified medical professionals," she says. "These are medical procedures and should not be taken lightly."

Today, when med spas can be found on every corner and cosmetic procedures abound on social media, this advice is especially pertinent. At Hall & Wrye, surgeons are seasoned and board certified while non-doctor staff receive an average of $7,000 to $10,000 yearly toward ongoing training. This benefits patients across all three practice areas: elective cosmetic procedures, including breast, body, and facial procedures; reconstructive procedures like breast and facial reconstruction; and med spa and hair restoration procedures.

Leading the practice is Wesley Hall Jr., M.D., who founded Hall & Wrye with fellow board-certified surgeon Scott Wrye, M.D.—both doctors graduated at the top of their class from medical school. Dr. Hall's reasoning for pursuing plastic surgery is twofold: He comes from a long line of surgeons on his paternal side and his mother, who is an artist, passed down the creativity he finds to be crucial in reconstructive and cosmetic procedures.

"There are things about our bodies that can affect how we feel about ourselves," says Dr. Hall. "Whether it's for a child who has had a severe dog bite to the face or someone who wants to remove excess skin after pregnancy, my goal is to improve their self-image."

PERSONALIZED PRACTICE

The board-certified surgeons and extensively trained staff at Hall & Wrye communicate with patients face-to-face to uncover their needs and discuss important aspects of procedures to consider, such as the recovery time or whether surgical or nonsurgical options will provide the best results.

"Relationship building with patients is a huge part of our day," says Dr. Hall. "There's no middleman, which is the way medicine should be."

One way Hall & Wrye provides the best patient care is by seeking technology and procedures that only provide the best results, even if that means sticking to the tried and true rather than pushing ineffective marketing gimmicks.

"This field changes rapidly as the years go by, but we plan to stick to our values," says Dufur. "Whether that means educating our patients or taking care of underserved patients in our community, we care for our people."
